

Out On a Limb: Saving the Urban Canopy

It is said that trees are the only form of city infrastructure that increase in value and capacity over time. So why do we continue to cut down trees and banish nature from our cities? In Out On a Limb: Saving the Urban Canopy, author Erna Buffie explores the secret lives and extraordinary benefits of trees in cities, the critical role urban forests can play in increasing climate resiliency, and how grassroots organizations can empower city leaders to invest in the urban forests and greenspaces we love – and need.

Erna Buffie is a writer, environmental activist, and documentary filmmaker, who worked with CBC's The Nature of Things for more than 20 years.
